Just you, me and the fish: Cory and 2-year-old Weston "Steemer" Borup hook up for some flyfishing Wednesday evening on the Provo River. The two men of the house try to get out once every week or so for some time together.

tion. CUWCD has spent the past year laying the groundwork for completion of the many-faceted project and is prepared to sign contracts for the largest construction project in Utah's history the moment H.R. 429 becomes law.

Christiansen pointed to the years spent in building a coalition between water interests and the environmental community. "Nobody has wavered. The bill provides funding for environmental concerns all along the way and everyone is ready to proceed."

Initially environmentalists opposed the project because of damage to the environment already done by construction of the dams and pipelines, and the lack of funding for environmental mitigation.

port board, said the board would prefer to lease the property, since that would provide a continuous income for airport operation.

Naylor listed numerous advantages to the airport site, including ample property for the foreseeable future (44.94 acres) plus land for the youth detention center, no wetlands, no farmlands, access from two freeway off ramps, nearby utilities and airport transportation availability.

Shivery solitude

Cold didn't deter Roland Lanza, who lives in Salt Lake City, as he casually wades of fishing etc.
